This result formed the copy for the text which was first printed in the Daily National Intelligencer, a newspaper published in Washington by Gales and Seaton, in the iasues of February 23, 25, and 27, 1830. Upon this text were based the subsequent editions, which appeared with as much promptness as was possible at that time;it is probable, however, that the full significance of the Great Debate was slow to dawn upon the people of this country. The editor has selected the famous close of the Reply, partly because its solemnity and beauty never tire, but mainly because it shows, by contrast with the Gales version, the growth of the orator. s own conceptions. It is a possibility that the reporter. s attention may have been so swept off its feet that the notes do not represent Mr. Webster. s actual words. However this may be, it is conceded that an orator has the right to treat his spoken words as any artist may his material, and refine upon them at his will. As Webster delivered his glowing words they must have had all the effect which the later refinement conveys to the...
