I wonder if she would regard the fact of my acquaintance with the Dinsmores as any sort of a proper introduction. She is alone here, and I might show her about a bit. I wonder if she is going to seem as charming in two days as she does now. I wonder--I wonder, he broke off, with a laugh, if I am getting moonstruck or a little daft over a girl I have seen just twice, and who is as far removed from my life as the moon. I remember the Dinsmores as nice, unpretentious people; but they belong to a very rich, and what they call in America old family. By this time Mr. Parsons had passed beyond the holiday crowd on the beach, and was climbing his way through the rock-lined tunnel to the fortified hill beyond the town, a spot particularly beloved on moonlight nights by Tommy Atkins on leave and by his town sweethearts. Parsons had been born near by, and, although none of his relatives lived now in the vicinity, most of the few vacations his busy life had spared him were spent on these shores. What a hard-working and self-denying life that had been, not many people knew; for the years that had taken him to the position he now occupied had seemed few and unusually successful. But his goal had lain in a direct line, and he had allowed himself no deviations. At his desk his subordinates found...
