CHAPTER XXIX RHODESIA TO-DAY The Transformation of a Wilderness--Sickness, Pestilence, and Massacre, Factors in the Settlement of a New Country --The Advent of Women and Children--Pastimes Dear to the British Heart--Political Agitation and Mr. Rhodes s Visit--Government of Rhodesia--Central Position--GoldProducing Capabilities--Agricultural Resources and the Land Question--Coal and Iron, one Measure of the Wealth of a State--Rhodesia an Attractive Field for Commercial Enterprise--England as a Colonizing Power--The Dark Continent the Future Scene of a Prominent Part of the World s Drama. That a wilderness in the heart of Africa should in less than one decade be supplanted by all the conveniences of civilization, is one of the marvels of our progressive age. In the year 1890 the British South Africa Company Pioneers journeyed by ox-wagon nearly one thousand miles beyond the frontier settlements of the Cape Colony, to a land possessed solely by wild beasts and menacing savages. To-day we find the sturdy Anglo-Saxon, with his language, laws, customs, and modern improvements, firmly established in that region. In substantial towns, which form the centres of large agricultural and mining districts, we find churches, schools, libraries, clubs, the Salvation Army, daily and weekly newspapers, courts of justice, jails--in short, all the components of modern civilization. The telegraph-wire has long since placed the inhabitants of that country in quick communication with every part of the civilized world, while railways have supplanted ox-teams and native porters as a means of transportation to the Atlantic and Indian oceans....
