At first the ants stored all of the pupae in the crevice between incline A and stage number one. After that had been accomplished, they began carrying them to the nest. This was conducted at night, by incandescent electric light; all of the other experiments of the series were conducted by daylight. X The pupae were carried up incline C to stage number two, across stage number two to incline if, down incline B to the nest. No pupae were carried down incline A. One pupa was conveyed down incline B, all the others down incline A. One worker ascended incline B to the stage and carried a pupa down incline A. ) One pupa was conveyed down incline B, the remainder down incline A. t All of the pupae were conveyed down incline B. 0 A very large majority of the pupae were carried down incline B to the nest. One pupa was carried down incline A to the nest and several were carried down incline A and stored under the base of the incline. Up to bedtime the pupae had not been carried to the nest. Thus the ants were lost for over 12 hours. In the course of half an hour all of the pupae had been stored in the dark chamber. There they were left, while the workers, one by one, straggled back to the nest. After the lapse of 21 hours and thirty minutes, the pupae were still...
