I wanted to think that no one in the world could miss her as much as I did. I wanted to feel offended by her death. I wanted to wrap up my grief, frustration, and anger over my sisters death, and never think about it again. There was nothing anyone could tell me; and mostly they never attempted to tell me, anything about her or how I was handling her death. I had difficulty in most daily activities. I didnt want to get out of bed. I was disheartened by people whose lives seem to keep going. I didnt understand why, even the world, seemed to keep spinning. There was pain in simply hearing her name. I couldnt even think of that day in January without crying. What had become worsel had tried to hide the pain. I was destroying myself with the thought that I wasnt strong enough to live without her. But in a moment of love; someone whom I loved, came to me with an act of kindness. She lovingly pointed out to me that my sisters death did not happen to ME. She said I was experiencing the loss, yes, but my sister diedI didnt. She may have never understood the light bulb that came on in my soul that day. At that moment, I understood my feelings of anger came from one placethe thoughtnothe FACTthat I had to go on living. And I had to go on livingwithout Melissa. I had to figure out a way to WANT to get out of bed. I had to devise a plan that would help me survive this horrific loss. I had to admit my painown...
