Excerpt: . between the veins of the system and the respiratory vessels, was seen in the Crustacea, where the venous sinuses, situated at the commencement of the branchial arches, may be regarded as so many repetitions of a simple form of a respiratory heart. In the class of Fishes, it will be seen that the heart is entirely respiratory, the arterial trunk which proceeds from it being distributed at once to the gills, and the blood which has been aerated in them being returned into a systemic artery or aorta, whence it proceeds to the body at large. In the higher Cephalopoda we observe a curious form of the circulating apparatus, which manifestly establishes the transition between that of the Mollusca in general, and that which is peculiar to Fishes. The systemic heart consists of only one cavity or ventricle, which is usually of a globular form, tolerably strong and muscular, and exhibiting bundles of fibres (carneae columbae) interlacing with one another (Fig. 118), as well as distinct valves protecting the mouths of the vessels which open into it. The aorta which proceeds from it, distributes arterial blood to the general system; and this is returned by means of the venous trunks, not immediately to the gills, as in the other Mollusca, but to two superadded impelling cavities, one of which is situated in connection with each row of gills. These branchial ventricles are less powerful than that which propels the blood through the system;...
